

Image Metrics

Elaborative descriptions of the image metrics and the procedures used to calculate them are presented below. In combination with Figures 1 and 2, the descriptions are intended to help the reader understand how the metrics reflect readily perceptible properties in images.

Luminance, Colorfulness, and Redness

Luminance was defined as the mean intensity of all pixels in an 8-bit grayscale version of the image (Gonzalez et al., 2004). In an 8-bit grayscale image, the intensity of each pixel can range from 0 (black) to 255 (white), with intermediate values as different shades of gray. Darker images have a lower mean intensity compared with brighter images. The images were transformed into grayscale using the rgb2gray function in Matlab.

Colorfulness was defined as the number of unique sRGB triplets in the image. In the RGB color space, the color of a pixel is represented by the relative intensity of red, green, and blue channels; that is – by an RGB triplet (Gonzalez et al., 2004). For images with a 24-bit color depth, the possible values in each channel can range from 0 (pure black) to 255 (bright red, green, or blue), which yields 256^3 possible colors. For example, a shade of dark red is represented by the following RGB triplet: [51, 0, 0], whereas a shade of bright purple is represented by: [208, 0, 208].

Redness was defined as the mean value of the normalized R channel in the sRGB color space (i.e., $R_{\text{norm}} = R / (R+G+B)$). Intuitively this metric corresponds with the average proportion of red in each pixel across the entire the image. For example, the following RGB triplet corresponds to a single pixel depicting bright orange: [255, 142, 20]. The proportion of red in the pixel or R_{norm} is: $255 / (255+142+20) = 0.61$. The mean value of R_{norm} across all pixels was used to measure redness. While the a^* channel in the CIE $L^*a^b^$ color space is occasionally used to manipulate redness in images, it was not used to measure redness in the current studies because it is possible for a pixel to have a large positive value in the a^* channel but not depict any red. For example, a pixel with the following parameters in the $L^*a^b^$ space: $L^* = 0$, $a^* = +128$, and $b^* = -128$, would appear blue, even though it has a large positive value in the a^* channel.

These metrics can be visualized in the images depicted in Figure 1. The children's album cover appears brighter and more colorful than the metal album cover, which is reflected in their mean grayscale intensity (Children: 211 vs. Metal: 43) and the number of unique RGB triplets (Children: 86296 vs. Metal: 59710). The second row of Figure 1 depicts color histograms for each image (Gaddam, 2010). The histograms were created by partitioning the intensity values for each RGB channel into five intervals (0 to 51, 52 to 103, 104 to 155, 156 to 207, and 208 to 255), yielding 5^3 or 125 bins, and counting the number of pixels that fell within each bin. The bins were normalizing according to their intensity and then sorted according to their Euclidean distance from normalized pure red $[1,0,0]$, with the distance increasing from left to right. The color of each bin corresponds to the RGB value of the lower limit of that bin. Some bins are absent from the histograms because there were no pixels in the image that fell within the corresponding interval. As the heavy metal album cover is less colorful than the children's album cover, most of the pixels in the metal album cover are contained within a few bins, especially towards the red end of the distribution, whereas pixels in the children's album cover are more evenly distributed across the color space. Indeed, the average proportion of red in each pixel is greater in the metal album cover ($R_{\text{norm}} = .46$) compared with the children's album cover ($R_{\text{norm}} = .35$).

Angularity

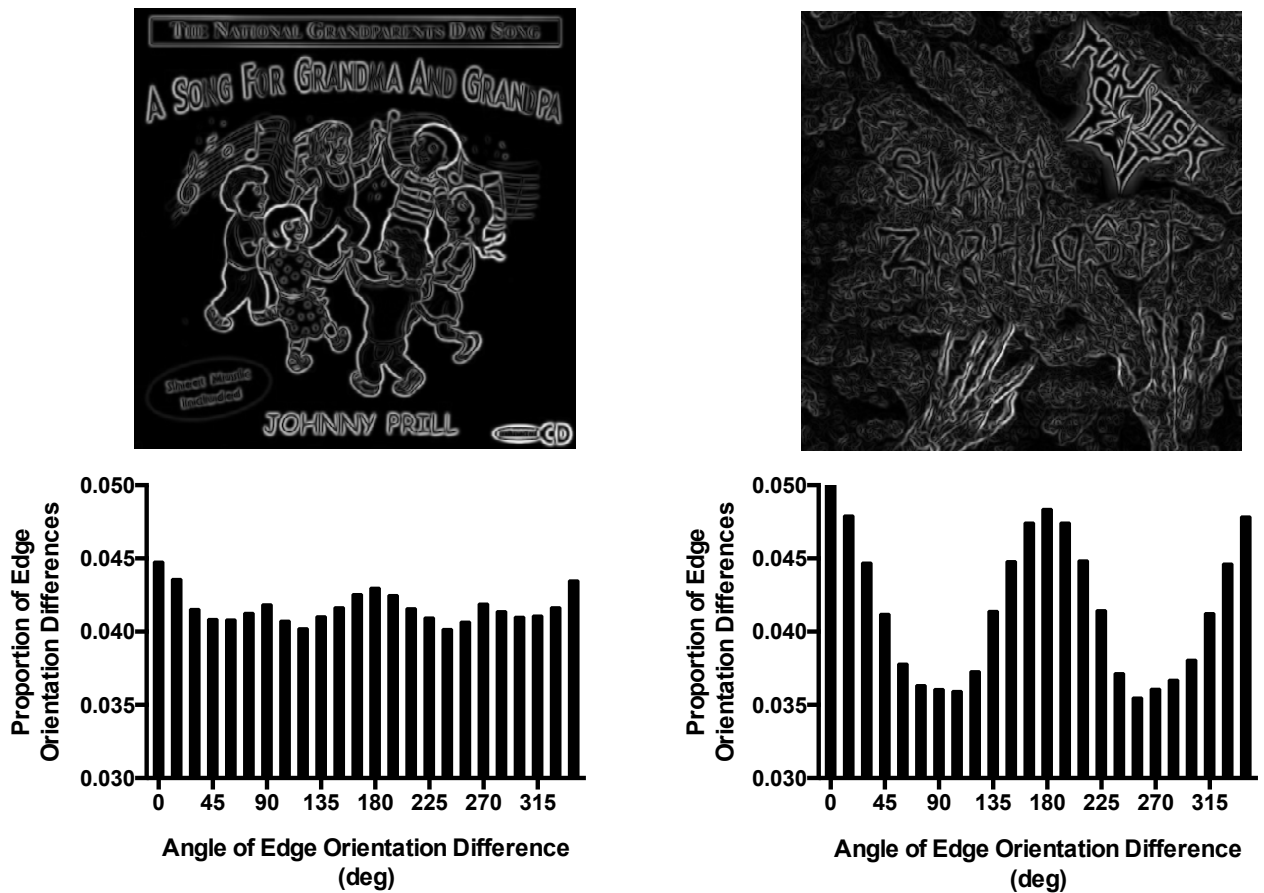

Angularity was defined as the 2nd order entropy of edge orientations¹, calculated according to the procedures outlined in Redies et al. (2017). The image was transformed into 8-bit grayscale and resized to a maximum of 120,000 pixels. Afterwards, an edge extracted version of the image was obtained by filtering the image with a bank of 24 oriented Gabor filters and retaining the top 10,000 edges with the greatest filter response. The product between each edge and every other edge was calculated and binned in a three-dimensional histogram parameterized by the distance between the pair of edges, the relative direction of the pair edges, and the difference in orientation between the pair of edges. Following Grebenkina et al. (2018), a one-dimensional histogram of edge orientation differences was obtained by averaging across distances between 20px and 240px and all relative directions. The histogram was normalized so that its total area sums to 1, and the uniformity of the histogram or Shannon entropy was then calculated. With 24 possible differences in orientation (i.e., 24 bins in the histogram) the maximum value of entropy is 4.585 (Redies et al., 2017).

To help visualize this procedure, consider the edge extracted versions of the album covers in the first row of Figure 2. The salience of an edge (i.e. strength of filter response) is represented by its brightness. Note that the salient edges in the children's album cover appear more curvilinear compared with those in the heavy metal album cover. When the orientation of a salient edge is compared with the orientations of other nearby salient edges, there is a higher degree of uniformity in the distribution of orientation differences for the children's album cover compared with the heavy metal album cover, as depicted in the second row of Figure 2.

¹ This metric is considered to be a 2nd order measure of entropy because it quantifies the uniformity of a histogram of pairwise differences among edge orientations. 1st order entropy would refer to the uniformity of a histogram of all edge orientations across an image.

Consequently, the histogram for the children’s album cover has a greater value of entropy compared with the heavy metal album cover (Children: 4.54 vs. Metal: 4.50), albeit the difference between them is small and the values are close to ceiling.

Self-Similarity, Complexity, and Anisotropy

Measures of self-similarity, complexity, and anisotropy were derived from an image analysis technique called a Pyramid of Histograms of Oriented Gradients (PHOG; see Braun et al., 2013 for detailed description). A PHOG progressively decomposes an image into smaller subsections, and for each subsection, the strength of luminance gradients, which are conceptually similar to edges, are calculated and binned into a histogram according to their orientation. Following the Matlab code provided by Redies (2019), the present studies used a three-level pyramid, which progressively decomposed the image into 4, 16, and then 64 equally sized subsections. For the image as a whole and for each subsection in each level of the pyramid, histograms of oriented luminance gradients were obtained. These histograms represent the relative strength of changes in luminance at different orientations. The histograms were obtained by converting the image into the CIE L*a*b* color space, calculating gradient magnitudes in each of L*a*b* channels using Matlab's gradient function, selecting the maximum gradient value across channels, and then adding the strength of that gradient to a bin according to its orientation. The histograms allowed for 16 orientation bins, covering a full 360 degrees. The histograms are then normalized so that their total area sums to 1.

The so-called ground approach was used to calculate self-similarity. To this end, the histogram intersection kernel was calculated between each histogram at the smallest level of the pyramid and the histogram for the image as a whole. The median value across all histograms was used as the measure of self-similarity. Values for self-similarity could range from 0 to 1, with greater values indicating greater self-similarity. Complexity was defined as the mean of the histogram for the image as a whole; that is – the average strength of luminance gradients across the entire image. Anisotropy was defined as the standard deviation of all histograms at the last level of the pyramid. Conceptually, anisotropy is a fine-grained measure of the variability in the strength of luminance gradients across orientations for the image as a whole.

To visualize these metrics, once again consider the album covers in the top row of Figure 1. Imagine decomposing each album cover into 64 equally sized sections. This would act as the third level in the pyramidal decomposition of the image. For the heavy metal album cover, the changes in luminance in each subsection are largely similar to those in the image as a whole, as the crevices and rock-like texture permeate the entirety of the image. Note that there few areas of uniform space, and salient changes in luminance are homogenously spread across orientations. In contrast, the changes in luminance in one subsection of the children's album cover are largely dissimilar to those in the image as whole, as the image contains areas of uniform space punctuated by different shapes, such as text, feet, hands, faces, and musical symbols. As a result of these characteristics, self-similarity and complexity are greater for the metal album cover compared with the children's album cover (Self-Similarity – Metal: 0.80 vs. Children: 0.57; Complexity – Metal: 19.24 vs. Children: 12.89), whereas anisotropy is lower for the metal album cover (Metal: 0.16×10^{-3} vs. Children: 0.70×10^{-3}).
